Reflections on Art, Work, and Walking

Reading Brian Eno's diary, and continuing on this need to write down more things. I wonder where I'm at, both in terms of programming, now that it is possible to really build fast with the glazed framework and hopefully the refactored geppetto framework, but also fast models and inference at the cost of gpt-oss. But this is already veering into the technical, when art has been more and more on my mind. I have been doing the photo stuff now enough to pass the first really hard cap, what is it that I really want to say beyond just the aesthetics and learning of it, or is that still why I do say, print development, just for the sake of having something novel, why new cameras all the time, why the drone, but I know it is maybe also just building a framework that one day I actually will use daily, it just doesn't look like this.

Should I try to remove the "i think" and "maybe" and "in a way" when writing? Yes, let's be more assertive. Building frameworks is for me the daily exercise, and the final product (why product? why not artwork?) grows without it being noticeable. Does glazed/geppetto/allthatstuff really amount to artwork at this point? How can it be made more clear? Or is the code and its relationship and tension to being used professionally something that illustrates a lower contradiction in my life? Worth pondering upon. Also the recurring thought of drawing lately, and the interest in comics which I had lost for quite a while. Drawing while watching the LLM do stuff is a possibility worth trying out. So is journaling? Or does the split attention actually break focus?

It is the case that if I pull out the laptop even just “to launch an agent”, I stop reading the book I was reading. Is that related to having slack and discord open however? I could close them and see if just having the agent is enough, but the intellectual effort of doing plans or coming up with ideas and tracking the progress is having an impact. Or is the impact that by doing come more ideas on what to do and the act of starting sets off a chain reaction that combined with the adderall hitting just continues off in its own direction. I think it is really productive even if it doesn’t seem like it to me. I have been locked in on programming the last few days, despite losing the regularity of streaming. Now that work stuff is more self-perpetuating, with kevin slowly (actually quite effective already), I can pick these things back up, since they cross-pollinate.

I had the idea of using gpt to train myself to write more colorful diaries. Worth testing on this text as well, since I want to explore the idea of writing like max frisch more, or maybe some essayist that have this strength of language, like the substack (that ultimately was quite vapid) talking about how scientists in britain got the first few corpses of platypus, being confronted with the alienness and uncategorizable object. In english, this richness of language will certainly come from vocabulary.

Interesting thoughts about the gpt-oss being trained certainly on synthetic data, and how it is apparently not able to write syntactically correct german. That is what a certain part of the critics apparently wants, right? A model that performs well in the areas that it is being trained on, but doesn't generalize. Certainly an interesting avenue, and the initial test with the bubbletea poker example yesterday was really quite promising.

Ok, time to experiment with some writing tutoring.

Interesting that I went straight to thoughts, and didn't write down my little walk from this morning, going to get red bull at the gas station, half the road blocked, a fire in the horizon which I tried to capture or find, but couldn't (it was somewhere near the mall, probably a car on the highway, the gas station attendants were wondering too, two teenagers and a dude with a mohawk who was a customer, they had some nice american banter thing going on). I took a picture of flowers on the basement near the blood donation corner.

I am still mildly influenced by the rinko kawauchi book I read yesterday, which I currently find kind of cute and vapid, but it shows how much image beauty can be found by looking more closely, recognizing this next level of “life detail”, which I could focus on in the next time, besides doing my black and white and photo printing experiments, and building the scanning box, and doing more 3d printing again. We’ll see where that leaves us. I also took pictures of a blached out I think rat? A weird long white tail, the corpse all bleached out, under the bridge or rather at the corner of the mall red light. Funny how I know this neighborhood, and while I thought I could see new things every time I walked there, the inspiration has seemed lacking in the last months.

I want to photograph people but is that... It is something deeper than just wanting to have variety. It ultimately is me (ultimately is yet another one of these filler words, but these words also show that I’m searching and questioning, and like in my computer communication, especially around LLMs, I know I know nothing, but I can try to get to a level of confidence that a certain track is what I want to follow for a long time if not ever, like with music, where I feel no desire to explore beyond techno. Maybe I will find something like that in photography, maybe it will my constant life companion).

It shows how few people I interact with, but is that the case? I don't need to build up a corpus in a few months that rivals other people, but one needs practice. Can you do deliberate practice with people, or do you just have to start? Do I want to photograph random people, do I want to approach random people? It certainly is part of what I appreciate in life, random people. I spend more time seeing random people from afar as human contact than speaking to humans face to face, besides eren and emily and ben, to a certain degree. It didn't always use to be that way, but I will never gain back the familiarity of the people I know in germany with whom I can have the more lightweight feeling of social interaction, despite conversations being heavier. Maybe writing letters comes back to it, but that doesn't make for photos, but maybe that's what I make photos for.
